

Eno Miles

Atlanta native Eno Miles grew up in a middle class home where his father was a piano player and his mother was a nurse. Miles enjoys the South's relaxed pace, although he fears Atlanta may be growing too quickly to maintain some of its charms. Miles has spent his life taking advantage of the many cultural opportunities and music venues that Atlanta has to offer. Music was the focus most of his life, having played the piano since he was ten. Miles developed his skills quickly, even accompanying on songs that made the Billboard charts and composing soundtracks to independent films. He often says playing the piano is the only time he feels truly focused. His painting style developed as he attempted to translate the song he'd written to canvas, a process that provided him with a greater sense of creative completion.

Miles studied International Studies at Georgia Tech with a concentration in Chinese language. He left school after two years and began bartending at local gallery openings. Leaving school allowed for the freedom to have a more creative lifestyle yet created more financial insecurity. His personal productivity and creative passion have grown immensely since leaving the confines of academia. Miles' painting career began with an extended trip to his family's farm in Athens, Georgia, where the bucolic setting provided ideal for creative expression. He returned from a two-month visit with numerous new paintings reflecting an entirely new and exciting style. Eno Miles' growing popularity at regional art shows has led to significant national interest in his art.
